RELIGIOUS ORDERS AND CITIES IN MEDIEVAL TUSCANY (10TH TO 14TH CENTURIES)

FRANCESCO SALVESTRINI

UNIVERSITÀ DEGLI STUDI DI FIRENZE

Medieval Tuscany was a land of cities. Accordingly, a large number of its religious institutions and many regular communities were located in urban contexts, and it is there that they developed over the centuries. Therefore, this part of Central Italy is one of the most interesting laboratories for studying the relations between Monasticism and built-up areas. Although these connections may appear essentially antinomian, given the Benedictines' vocation for seeking the spiritual and natural desert, they are actually a topic of great interest for their religious, social and economic implications.¹ In fact, Black Benedictines, Cistercians and hermits included in regular Orders (eremiti regulares) such as the Carthusian and Camaldoiese) often settled in the countryside and woodlands, but they kept some dependencies, churches and properties in cities and suburbs.² On the other hand, many Tuscan monasteries were built in major and minor towns and formed an important reference for the urban patriciate. Finally, most of the female cloisters established during the 13th and 14th centuries were in urban settlements.³

In the Early Middle Ages (6th to 11th centuries), Benedictine Monasticism, especially following the Cluniac Reform, had a limited presence in Tuscany.⁴ Apart from the important monasteries of Abbadia San Salvatore on Monte Amiata (in the south-east part of the region) – built during the first half of the 8th century on a mountain near the border of the Church lands (Patrimonium Sancti Petri in Tuscia)⁵ – and Sant'Antimo, near Siena,⁶ some of the most important and richest foundations of the late Lombard and Carolingian periods were established in or around cities, such as; Lucca (monastery of San Frediano, ca. 680),⁷ Siena (monastery of Sant'Eugenio, early 8th century),⁸ and Pistoia (monastery of San Bartolomeo, first half of the 8th century).⁹

From the 9th to the 10th century, urban noblemen and landlords founded several monasteries as private settlements (Eigenklöster). However, at the time of the Marquis Hugh of Tuscia (953/54-1001) the erection or endowment of Benedictine communities assumed institutional and eminently ‘public’ connotations, which particularly marked the urban environment. This is the case of the so-called Badia Fiorentina (Santa Maria, in Florence), built by the Marchional family in 978 in the heart of the city, and chosen by the lord of the region as his burial place.¹⁰

Monasticism in Tuscany acquired new importance during the early decades of the 11th century, at the time of the so called ‘Gregorian’ reform of the Church, when the region became the centre of significant phenomena, like the birth of religious movements such as the Camaldolesi and the Vallumbrosan orders. Tuscany gave the Church the reformist popes Nicholas II (1058-61) and Alexander II (1061-73),¹¹ and felt the actions of bishops who early on promoted communal life for the clergy in Lucca, Pistoia and Siena, to give just a few examples.¹² Tuscany was the birthplace of the hermitic obedience of Camaldoli and its dependant foundations, as well as the coenobitic Order of Vallombrosa founded by John Gualberto, who led the fight against Simony, Nicolaitism and corruption among the clergy in Florence. These experiences of ‘new’ Monasticism, which initially claimed territories in the dioceses of Florence, Fiesole and Arezzo, placed Tuscia as the vanguard of Church reformation, in close connection with Pataria riots that broke out in Lombardy.¹³ During this peculiar period, irregular hermits also flourished in cities. A case was Teuzzzone, a special example of an urban anchorite living in a cell at the Badia Fiorentina.¹⁴

To return to the Coenobites, we can add that representatives of regular communities rarely respected their vow of stability (stabilitas loci). Monks often moved from their cloisters to rural settlements or towns, both for religious and commercial reasons.¹⁵ In fact, their monasteries provided the markets of Lucca, Pisa, Pistoia, Florence, Siena, Volterra and other towns with important supplies; monks often took on the duties of priests and preachers in secular churches.¹⁶

As we noted earlier, the relations between towns and nunneries deserve special mention. Nuns, in fact, needed priests for the divine office, and they claimed the protection due to unmarried women. Furthermore, their conventional communities always enjoyed both the support of the most eminent citizens and the protection of kith and kin. Families used to place their young daughters or widows in cloisters, knowing that they could interfere to a greater extent in nunneries' affairs – since female communities were subject to episcopal jurisdiction – than in powerful and independent male congregations. For centuries, copying manuscripts, manufacturing goods and charitable works underscored the discreet but important contribution these religious women made to the development of urban centres.¹⁷

Some scholars point out that the congregational structure of the Vallumbrosan Order anticipated and influenced the first definition of the Cistercian experience, for example in the structure of the General Chapter of abbots, the role of lay brothers (conversi), and the disciplinary visitations of monasteries.¹⁸ It is not easy to prove this assumption through contemporary sources. It seems certain, instead, that the presence of indigenous traditions of the Benedictine reformation (that is Vallumbrosans, Camaldoleses, and hermits living in less populated southern parts of the region, like the Guglielmites of Maremma)¹⁹ significantly slowed the spread of the Cistercians within the region's borders during the 12th century.²⁰ It should be noted, in fact, that the first permanent settlement of White Monks in Tuscia – that is the foundation of San Galgano, in the countryside near Siena (1201-03) – dates from the beginning of the 13th century. In any case, even the brothers of St. Bernard, although mainly located in rural areas, quickly forged relations with the urban environment, as borne out by the monks of San Galgano, who became chamberlains, officers and superintendents of public works for the municipality of Siena; or by the monks of Badia a Settimo (daughter-abbey of San Galgano) in similar relations with the nearby city of Florence.²¹ The Carthusians, whose development close to Tuscan cities (Pisa, Florence, Lucca and Siena) dates back to the 14th century – the period that saw the growth of the Tuscan Monasticism of the Olivetans – also followed a similar pattern.²²

However, at the beginning of the 13th century, the blurring of memories connected to the fight for Church reforms, and the relatively minor role the Cistercians played in the development of religious consciousness among Tuscany's citizens – and particularly the lower classes – opened the way for a massive penetration of the latest Benedictine reforms²³ and Mendicant Orders in all the main cities and many smaller towns.²⁴ Religious life in the cities and countryside of Tuscany during the

Mendicant religiosi novi were active preachers.²⁸ We can mention the example of the Dominican Peter the Martyr, who led the struggle against the Cathars in Florence during the 1240s.²⁹ The friars' homiletics also played an important role in the defence of orthodoxy and in the struggle against social 'plagues' such as usury or sexual deviations, which, in the opinion of religious men, were produced by urban development.³⁰

As is widely known, Mendicants largely influenced new models of holiness.³¹ They organised lay people in a capillary confraternal system (laudesi, disciplinati, and finally Third Orders),³² with special attention paid to forms of female devotion and religious experiences, such as the voluntary seclusion of women.³³ Friars promoted the cult of the Passion of Christ, laying the basis for the movement of Flagellanti.³⁴ They often joined or replaced Cistercians or Vallumbrosans in public offices in Communal cities, decisively influencing town planning and architecture.³⁵

Settlements of these religiones were located mostly in the suburbs – or the so-called burgi – which were the areas that underwent rapid and intense population growth, due mainly to migration from the countryside. Friars often re-used existing buildings (churches, oratories, hospitals). Later they moved to new monasteries built with the support of municipal authorities and the wealthiest citizens.³⁶

Mendicants owed their success to their pastoral activities targeting all social ranks, and to their close relations with ruling classes. From the middle of the 13th century, new urban regimes of the Populus (that is governments of merchants and entrepreneurs) afforded friars special protection.³⁷ At the same time, in Tuscany as well, religious brothers became flexible tools in the hands of the Apostolic See, since they were less constricted by the bonds that the secular clergy (Bishops and, especially, cathedrals Chapters) had with members of the leading families who had founded the Consular rule of urban Communes during the 12th century.³⁸

The religious Orders that attained Papal legitimacy at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), and survived the rationalisation of the Council of Lyon in 1274 – the assembly that obliterated many pauperistic-inspired *oboedientiae*³⁹ – often outclassed, not without strong opposition, the Church hierarchy in the competition for the devotion of the faithful. This phenomenon, obviously, was not limited to Tuscany. However this land was, as we have said, one of the most densely urbanised areas in Late Medieval Italy and Europe, and its dynamic, rich and socially stratified cities were always in need of new spiritual answers. Tuscany, therefore, was an ideal land for the expansion of friars and their confraternities who, during approximately 1220 to 1280, came to occupy many physical places which had, up until then, been more or less the exclusive domains of Benedictine monks.

Let us now take a brief look at the chronology. In Florence, the Frates de Poenitentia of St. Francis of Assisi that comprised some lay devotees who later joined together in the Order of Minoritic Tertiary, gathered in an as-yet unformalised way at the Hospital of San Gallo (still outside the city walls) in 1209-18 (the settlement was formalised in 1218).⁴⁰ In 1228, friars were already in the basilica of Santa Croce, which became the most important Minoritic settlement in 13th century Italy.⁴¹ Dominicans arrived from Bologna in 1219 and settled first on the east, then the west side of the city, at the Hospital of San Pancrazio. Later (1221), with the favour of Pope Gregory IX, they gathered in the final settlement of Santa Maria inter vineas, which became Santa Maria Novella.⁴² Augustinians came to San Matteo, on the hill of Arcetri, during the first half of the century, and in 1250 settled at Santo Spirito, in the new city district of Oltrarno.⁴³ The same year marked the definitive settlement of the Serviti at Santa Maria in Cafaggio (now known as Santissima Annunziata).⁴⁴ The Saccati arrived at Sant'Egidio in 1259, and finally, in 1268, the Carmelites came to Santa Maria del Carmine.⁴⁵ All the religious communities, as we have said, first reached the suburbs and then moved 'downtown', within the city walls. In Florence, they played an important role in city planning and administration. The urban structure, in fact, was divided into four districts or quarters in 1343. The first identified the old city and had its centre in the Baptistry (San Giovanni). The other three districts referred to the main settlements of the Mendicants: Santa Croce (Franciscan), Santa Maria Novella (Dominican), Santo Spirito (Augustinian).

Comparing the Florentine situation with that of other Tuscan cities in relation to the major regular families, we can see that from 1228 (the year St. Francis was canonised) to 1230, the religio fratrum Minorum settled in Pisa, Pistoia, Arezzo, Lucca, Prato, in Valdinievole, in the town of Figline Valdarno, in the centres of Valdelsa and in Valdichiana.⁴⁶ On the other hand, the final settlements of Franciscans in Siena and Cortona date from 1236 and 1240-45 respectively.⁴⁷

The Dominicans began building their great Sienese basilica in 1226. They arrived in Pistoia at the end of the 1240s, in Pisa more or less ten years later, and at San Gimignano in 1278. In Arezzo, they built their final conventus in 1275, and consecrated their great church of San Romano in Lucca in 1281.⁴⁸ Carmelite hermits were present in Pisa from 1248 – the year after the insertion of the Order in the Mendicant family – and in Siena from 1256.⁴⁹

Towards the middle of the 13th century, Tuscany had more than fifty sites collected in seven custodiae of Minor friars.⁵⁰ Each custodia had a Chapter that elected a president (custos) and brought together the governors of monasteries, called guardian fathers. The Dominican friars had seven monasteries, located more or less in the same cities that served as capitals of the Franciscan custodiae.

Considering that Dominic de Guzmán had died in 1221 and Francis of Assisi in 1226, it is easy to confirm the precocity of their Orders' settlements in Tuscany during the transition from a deliberate initial uncertainty, when fraternitas was more important for friars than regular vita communis, to the season of the great, monumental monasteries.⁵¹

Anyway, in addition to large regular families, Tuscan cities were settled by lesser known but no less important Orders, both local and foreign. Among those already mentioned are the Umiliati, religious craftsmen of Benedictine, then Mendicant connotation.⁵² They, perhaps more than any other regular family, favoured an encounter between religious life and work; their work that was not so much (or not only) in the fields, in line with the Benedictine tradition, but rather a proto-industrial manufacturing.⁵³

Moreover, at the end of the Middle Ages, the new Orders were able to accommodate the requests of craftsmen, merchants and entrepreneurs.⁵⁴ For example, through the lay Order of Gesuati from Siena, they restored the lawfulness of honest trades, and the possibility for religious penitents to work, produce goods and sell them to the public, bringing the activities that substantiated the development of Communal cities into line with the holy life.⁵⁵

We have said that in the 13th century Tuscan Mendicants were privileged compared to Cistercians. However, the Florentine case shows that the first mode of settlement was similar for all the religiones. In the city, the initial support of bishops Ardingo Foraboschi (1231-49) and Giovanni Mangiadori (1252-74) was a determining factor for official recognition of the Serviti (1247), the consolidation of the Dominican settlement, the advent of the Umiliati and the arrival of the Cistercians on the outskirts of Florence.⁵⁶

Certainly there were conflicts. Typical contrasts, also seen elsewhere, between secular and regular clergy, especially focusing on ecclesiastical rights and on relations with faithful population, flanked disputes among friars, who were always competing for the best locations in towns. For example, in Pisa all four major Mendicant families had a long struggle with the Archbishop and the Cathedral Chapter.⁵⁷

However, the religious settlements were flexible, and this allowed for forms of convergence that were based upon an ability to fit into local realities. This is well demonstrated by the case of Pistoia. Here the idleness and, perhaps, the hostility of the pro-imperial Bishop Graziadio Berlinghieri (1222/23-50) slowed the consolidation of the Franciscan settlement up to 1250. Later however, the next episcopus Guidaloste Vergiolesi (1252-84) allowed the friars to move to a more appropriate site, and welcomed both the Dominicans and the Serviti who were coming to the city.⁵⁸ Moreover, even in Ghibelline Pisa, the first impact of the 'new religious' with the Episcopal Curia had been positive, and the Archbishop Federico Visconti (1254-77) wove praise of the Mendicants into his sermons, and proposed friars as models for his diocesan clergy.⁵⁹

On the other hand, we can see that as Benedictine Monasticism did not reject the urban dimension, similarly the Mendicants (excluding the Dominicans, who wanted to be close to existing universities (studia) or create new ones, which is why they preferred to settle in major centres) usually did not reject rural locations. The hermit component of the Franciscan and Augustinian Orders prove it; not to mention that the Mendicant apostolate made no conceptual distinction between the urban and rural faithful.

Urban society and the cities' ruling classes only offered the Cistercians protection, support and donations of land. For the Mendicants, instead, cities were the largest concentrations of souls that the reality of the time could offer. They were hotbeds of sin and basins of redemption, so it was logical and proper to be present in them. And whoever won in the cities and in the consciences of citizens had better luck than those who had tried to find a way of their own and common salvation in contemplation. On the other hand, the active collaboration of the ruling classes with the Mendicants was no longer just a matter of professional advice or for promoting economics-businesses, as it was with the Cistercians or the Umiliati. Religious orders like the Dominicans had effective tools, forged in the struggle against heresy, to strike and marginalise the most dangerous Ghibellines in Guelph towns,⁶⁰ to approach the new emerging classes through the creation and promotion of lay brotherhoods, and to help people and urban regimes to renew city politics.

Furthermore, we must remember that the major Orders, such as the Franciscans, encouraged much of the public assistance, increasing the regular contributions donated to managing hospitals for the sick and hospices for pilgrims. There were also religious families that focused on the needy, such as the Giamboniti, who in 1237 (before being absorbed by the Augustinians) replaced the Franciscans in the Florentine hospital of San Gallo with the support of the Pope and the local Bishop.⁶¹ Next, we must mention the commitment of the Mendicants to helping that particular class of the needy who the dynamics of business had abruptly moved from wealth to poverty (poveri vergognosi). For example, the friars later established the Monti di Pietà, pawnshops that served an important role in curtailing usury.⁶²

Franciscans and Dominicans became protagonists of urban culture, something Benedictines almost never did.⁶³ They opened their studia (generalia, provincialia, particularia) to outside scholars and pupils (both religious and lay).⁶⁴ They added investigation and systematic theology to their direct communications with the faithful, using words and gestures in their preaching, as well as ‘educational’ works of art, such as the fresco cycles that decorated the aisles of their large churches. Finally, they resorted to the religious, moralistic and parenthetical theatre of the Sacre rappresentazioni.⁶⁵

Mendicant Orders were able to interpret the need for new standards and new forms of protection expressed by a heterogeneous population, largely from rural areas, that was concentrated in the poorer and newer districts of the towns. The friars met the aspirations of a recently-urbanised middle class of artisans and merchants. In the confraternal proposals of the religious brothers (milites Christi, milites Virginis), this new class was able to experience an effective association system which became an alternative to the noblemen’s societies.

I will conclude this necessarily brief paper with some historiographical considerations. Research on Benedictine and Mendicant settlements in Tuscany has made significant progress during the last thirty years. Furthermore, Italian studies on the regular clergy have emerged from the cloisters and the monopoly of religious families in which they had been held for centuries. Important works have greatly furthered the research into Benedictine Monasticism, and illuminated the world of Mendicants from the point of view of the history of holiness, of anthropology, and the history of art and architecture. Perhaps the time has come for us to emphasise comparative analyses and conduct further considerations on the impact of the Black Monks on the urban milieu, focusing attention, for example, on little known monastic preaching, and the Benedictine contribution to the delineation of local cults, which are profound issues especially for Mendicants.

Through new projects that combine researches on Benedictines with studies on Mendicant religiones novae it will be possible to come to a better understanding of the issues concerning relations among popular religion, ecclesiastical institutions, communal rules and urban society during the Middle Ages.
